

Podugu, Pooja. "James Casebere Talks Photography," The Harvard Crimson,
October 19, 2012,

The Harvard Crimson

---

October 19, 2012

James Casebere Talks Photography

By Pooja Podugu, Contributing Writer

James Casebere, an accomplished post-modern photographer, laid out his philosophy of photography, which focuses around using empty space to evoke an emotional response from viewers, during his talk on Thursday night.

"I suppose you could say that, more often than not, emptiness is my subject," Casebere, a visiting lecturer, said at the Carpenter Center. "I very consciously try to put the viewer in the image and imagine them in relation to the space that is in the image," he later added.

Casebere often photographs model landscapes and scenes—intricately detailed yet sparse structures that he constructs to replicate particular kinds of buildings. Casebere then subjects these models to varying degrees of dramatic lighting and coloring.

His work has been displayed at a number of prominent museums, including the Whitney, The Guggenheim, and the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City.

In his talk, Casebere presented a slideshow full of his most powerful photos and discussed their meanings. Many pieces were inspired by his childhood memories. These include "Bacillus Pestis," based on his experience of watching Saturday morning cartoons, and "Warm Bed, Hot Coals," grounded in childhood concerns about coal fires on Minnesotan streets during winter.

 MAGDALENA KALA

James Casebere, a visiting lecturer in the Visual and Environmental Studies department, awed a full audience in the Carpenter Center. Casabere presented his body of work in constructed photography based on complex models he has built in his studio.

Another part of Casebere's work was inspired by prisons in America, and their general sense of isolation. During this period, Casebere constructed many haunting pieces, including "Eastern State Penitentiary," "Panopticon Prison," "Sing Sing," "Asylum," "Two Bunk Cell," and "Toilets," among others.

This series was a favorite among audience members. "I thought the prison pictures were very powerful by letting you as the viewer experience the loneliness and the confinement of these spaces," said Bill Deveney, a Cambridge resident.

The American suburb has also served as a focal point for Casebere's work. "This series is partly about evoking the memories and history of the place, but much more about the present than the past," he said.

These images were also quite striking to audience members, including Professor David Rodowick, chair of the VES Department. "I was surprised at what a powerful emotional response these images generated," he said. "They lack human beings, yet they draw you in. The isolation implies that you as the viewer are meant to fill in the space. He carefully controls perspective to make you feel part of the image itself."